EVIL OVERCOMB.

EYIL OVERCOME.

For many days after this aecident Wycombe lay in a precarious state, hevering between life and death. At last a favorable change took place, and he was proneased out of dauger, though his recovery was Budy to be tedious, and he could only rise from his bed of sickness a cripple for life. During the first stage of his illness the young Greys were only able to show sympathy by inquiring after him at his room door, or by showing kindness to his mother, who had some to nurse him; but when he bagan to recover, Mrs. Wycombe was obliged to leave him for many hours together, while she went home to attend to other business; and then their charity was often severely taxed to provide attendance and amusement for him. Wycombe was not at all an easy person to please or wait on at the best of times; and now, when he was suffering severe pain, and his temper was soured by his misfortune, he became what Charlotte and Edward pronounced to be perfectly unbearable.

ever; and the other boys treated them civility, though not cordially.

It was evident that Lyon's conviction of Sidney's innocemee was not shared by the other boys. Sidney hosed to conquer their bad ening in by patience and good conduct. Dudding, Edward and Charlotte trumbled a good deal that there had been no public clearing of Sidney's character, and declared that the affair had ended unsatisfactority. Charlotte had invented a hundred different carastrophes; "all," she declared, "better than this."

declared, "better than this."

Foster re-appeared among his school-fellows, lecking pale and grave. There was a marked improvement in his behavior in school hours, and in the playgroutd he waiked much alone, and seemed senerally occurred by either, writing, or redding generally occupied in either writing or reading over a letter. He was constantly beginning it over again, getting nearly to the end of it, and then destroying it in nervous haste. This mys-terious letter the cerious among his companions terious letter the curious among his companions discovered was alternately a ldressed to Dr. Wise, Lyon, or Sidney Grey. Lyon was often observed to watch Foster intertly, and was several times heard to say atoud in his presence, that if snybody had anything particular to tell him be was always ready to hear it. Foster comforted himself with the idea that he was only waiting to make his confession until he had soon Wycombe again, and made some arrangement with him about receiping the rote to lyon. He "No, indeed, not Ir It is not I that have been making mischef, said Colline, with his about restoring the rose to Lvoir. You take it up to him, and you'll see that he'll care ten times more for that thun for all your patience and care; I know him of old. If he can get what no likes to car, that is all he cares for. Do you surpose that having a leg out think he would have had to have his leg out off if there were no hope of improving his character?"

"Nay," said Lyon, "you are getting a great ceal too deep for me; you had better go. But I'll tell you something, tirey: I'm half inclined to say that I would have both me legs out off if it would make my character like yours. Half inclined, remember—not quite."

Wycombe was lying with his eyes shat whea Sidney entered the room, so he put the fruit down noiselessly on the table, and took a seat by the best. There was a sullen, unhappy look on Wycomb's face, even while he slept, that was painful to see. Sidney thought over what Lyon had been saying, and on all Wycombe's ungracious saying, and ways, until he was half disposed to think that Lyon was right, and that there were peo, de on whom sympathy and love were thrown away, and for whom common things would do just as well.

In a few minutes Wycombe lifted up his head, He had not been asleep; he had been lying thinking; and cidney was surprised to see the thinking; and cidney was surpreed to see the traces of tears en his face and piltow.

"I suppose than's you, Sidney Grey?" he said. "You have been a way a long time. It's as shame that I'm to be always left; you would not like it if you were ill. I heard some one talking to you'in the garden: who was it?"

"Lyon. He has brought you a basket of fruit

"Has he? You may put it down; I don't want any just now. Is it a fine evening? What are all the others doing?" "They were playing at trap in the playground when sleft."

when eleft."
"At trap? Ob!" grouned Wycombe, "everything goes on just the same. It does not make much difference to any one, I suppose, my being ill."

Bidney was obliged to be silent. The differ-ence it did make was not exactly what Wy-combe on his sick-bed would be comforted to Wycombe raised his head up in the bed for an instant, and looked estrestly at him. "I say, Eddaev Grey," he said, at last, "why de you come and sit in this herrid dall room on a fine Rival Cruscos; you were interested in it last night."

"You may if you like "said Wycombe, sinking back; "It's all very dull and horrid. I don't much mind what any one does."
Sidney took up the book; but, before he had found the place, Wycome spoke again.
"I say, Sidney Grey, do you remember the time when I used to plague you so, and when we were going to put you in the pond?"
"Never mind that now," said Sidney.
"I was not the worst; it was King that was the worst, ch?"
"Don't let us talk of it now," said Sidney.

"Dont let us talk of it now," said fidney.

"No more we will," said Wycombe; but there is another thing. It was I that tripped you up on the ice that day. I did it for fon. I did not mean to hart you exactly. Bid you know it was I?"

"You see I did," said Sidney.
"You see I did not know, then?"
"No; but now you do. You knew what pain
a You will never hur any one again."
"I shall never have a chance," said Wycombe; "I shall never have a chance," said Wycembe; it will be people's turn to trip me up, and laugh, and make fun of me; but I can't bear it. I won't, I won't I won't! I wish I were dead! It s dreafful! I can't bear it!" And the unhappy boy ouried his head in the pillow, and burst into cry of passionate despair.

Lipsy waited until he was a little calmer, and then went up to the bed, and leaned over him. "I have been lame all my life," he said, "and I have not found it so bad to bear."

"You and I are different," said Wycombe, in a choked volce.

a choked voice.

"There will be one thing in us alike," said Sidney, "and we will help each other. You will get to like belong other people now you have suffered yourself."

"Mo, I shan't," said Wycombe, looking up;

"I shan't be ready to help other people, because I am unhappy myself. I shall hate cripples and afflicted people more than ever, because they will put me in mind of what I am. I shall keep out of their way, and when I see them I shall hate them."

"I hope not," said Sidney, earnbatly.

"Why? Why do you look so grave? Would it be so very dreadful if I did, that you need look almost frightened about it? Is it my fault if I can't help feeling my misfortune?"

"You can help how you feel it," said Sidney. "Do you remember what it says in the Bible about Pharsoh's heart being hardened?"

"I have heard it, but I never knew what it meant," said Wycombe.

"He would not let the troubles God sent him make him better, you know; so they made him worse—every one worse than he was before, till he died."

"Of having deceived my father!" said Lyon, in a tone of surprise. "I never did such a thing in my his, sic." "Of having deceived your father, I repeat,"

said the dictor. "Can I believe that if you had really lost the note he speaks of, or had it taken from you as your father evidently suspects, that you would never have made any scarce or inquiiv after it—never even referred me of the loss? I can scarcely suppose that even you would be so careless, so indifferent to the honor of the school, as to allow such a suspicion to rest on get what he likes to ear, that is all he cares for. Do you suppose that having a leg cut off can change a percuots whoole character?

"And," said ridgey, thought whoole character?

"think he would have had to have his leg cut off if there were no hope of improving his character?"

"Well?" said the Doctor. "I hope you will excuse my answering any more questions to night, sir," said Lyon, who, between his indignation for himself and anxiety for Sidney, was getting so confused that he could not make up his mind what he sucht to could not make up his mind what he ought to

"Are you aware," said the doctor, "that, by your hesitation and want of frankness, you are confirming my worst fears?"

"I am sorry for it, sir," said Lyon. "I can only say that I have not teld any untruth, or done anything I should mind telling my father.

I asked you just now, if you had heard anything of this note, you said you had heard a great deal about it. Pray, why was not I spoken to en the subject before?"

"Lyon wished us not to say anything about it," enswered Collins, rather confused.

The doctor's brow lewered again; and Collins, who was indignant at what seemed to him, the doctor's injustice, hastened to say what he hoped would clear his friend. "Lyon wished us to say nothing about the loss of the note, because every one suspect's Sidneys of having stolen it, and be did not want to bring Grey into trouble."

"Sutney Grey!" said Dr. Wise, aghast.

Colins hung his head, and muttered something about thinking thet the doctor wanted to hear the whole truth.

The doctor got up, took two or three turns up and down the room, and returned to his chair.

"This is a very serious business, young gentlemen," he said, "and one into which I must make the strictest inquiry. At the same time, I am anxious not to do anything hastily, or to run any risk of suspecting any one unjustly. I shall take a week to think of it. During that time, I shall try to collect all the information I can; and on this day week I shall make a public investigation in the presence of the whole school. I shall expect, Lyon, that by that time you will have made up your mind to answer all the questions I shall think it right to put to you.

If I find that any one has committed a theft; er
if you, Lyon, have pretended the loss of money which you have, perhaps, spent, the grilty person will be disgraced and expelled the school. I am sorry that Sidney Grey's name has been mentioned. He is the very last boy in the school

Lyon both made an attempt to interrupt); "keep

"He so kind as to explain these circumstances to me," said the doctor.

"I was afraid that if you came to make inquiries about the note, you might be led to sustent." Lyon began his sentence in an eager tene, and then stopped short suddenly. He remembered just in time that he had no right to mention Sider.

"Do you object to tell me," said the doctor more graciously, "if there is any one in the school whom you suspect of having taken the note?"

There was a few minutes' silence after Sadney spoke, and then Wycombe said, "I wish you would go on reading."

Sidney took up the book again, and read on without remark, for he saw that Wycombe was not listening. He had drawn the bed-clothes over his head, and Sidney thought he was crying quietly. At last he laid the book down, and got up to leave tae room. Then Wycombe lifted up his head and beckened him to come to the bed-side. "I say," he said, in a gentler voice than he had ever been heard to speak in before, "when you go to bed to-night, I wonder whether you could say something about me in your prayers—something about my not being like Pharo—about my not hardening my heart? You would know how to put—"

"That I will," said Sidney; "but could you not pray for yourself?"

"I don't know any prayers," said Wycombe. "Cannot you recollect any of the prayers we say in church?" said gitney: "not any of the collects? I wish you would let me bring my prayer-book up with me. I could mark some for you that are exactly what you would like to say." Thank you, I wish you would. You can

"Therefore, it is evident that if the angles od and cf are equal to the angle cf, the drawingroom can wait till I have come to the end of this," said Lyon, without looking up from his book.

"No it can't," said Collins; "it is not Mrs.
Wise who has sent for you to play at chess, or anything of that sort, but the Doctor."

"Which is impossible," said Lyon. "No, I don't see now, why it's impossible. You've put it all out of my head. Oh, well! I suppose I must go, then."

"I suppose you must," said Collins, with a half-anused, half-important expression of face, that caught Lyon's eye as soon as he raised it from his book.

"No, indeed, not It. It is not I that have been note?"

Lyon looked straight in the doctor's face, and answered boldly. "If I did, sir, I find it so extremely disagraphable to be suspected myself, that I should be sorry to throw suspicion on any one clse, unless I had very strong proofs that I was not mistaken."
"Humph!" said the doctor. "You may sit down for the present, Lyon. Now, Collins, when I asked you just now, if you had heard anything of this note, you said you had 'heard a great deal
